The effect these early experiences upon

Quite different is the other picture. The saudest and most pathetic figure in England to-day is undoubtedly General Sir Resvers Buller. Pallen from his pedestal, the laurel wreaths plucked from his brow, this hero of a hundred fights, who, when little more than a boy, won the Victoria Cross at the sword's point, is now denounced in most unmistakable terms by both press and public.

One of the most pitful phases of the story is that General Buller, with a billind stubboraness that is quite inexplicable, brought all the trouble upon himsest.

When the discussion began about the serious British defeats incurred in attempting the relief of Ladyamith, when General Buller was criticised for his message to Sir ing the relief of Ladysmith, when denotal Buller was criticised for his message to Sir George White and the terrible Spion Kop fiasco, the public was inclined to favor him. When he returned to his home in Devonshire the General was feted, presented with a sword of honor and literally smothered in garlands of myrtle and laurels.

Still criticism raged throughout the country. General Buller insisted on the truth being known. Ministers advised him to let being known. Ministers advised him to let the matter pass; that certain documents had been suppressed for the sake of his feelings. But no. Buller, builheaded as ever insisted on a vindication of his character. He has done it with a venseance. The publication of such dispatches as General Buller insisted on the public's knowing, caused an outbreak of indignation and horror in clubland and in the street. People talked of him with a blush of shame that any British General could have behaved in the way he did. He admits himself that he wanted to abandon Ladysmith, leave the gallant garrison to its fate and retire to some place where he could take the defensive against the Boers.

The newspapers express regret, not so much for General Buller's sake as for the prestige of the British Army, that these dispatches should have been alowed to see the light.

The Times says: 'He brought even greater condemnation upon himself.'

The Standard says: 'His condemnation stands written by his own hand. His words are strangely humiliating.'

The Dally Mail says: 'His message was even worse than supposed. It is a craven missive.'

Buller Compared With White.

The Daily Telegraph asks its readers which of the two Generals they would be. Buller, who sickened and despaired and who was unable to grasp the situation, or White, who, despite the alarming increase of enteric fever, still refused the very idea of surrender.

Yet Buller was a General, who was sent out to South Africa with a great flourish of trumpets; who said he would take the Boer
